

Editor Pick | This type of pan actually makes food taste better
And it's affordable, too.

Costume Designer in a Performance with Natalie Frank Team for 'Grimm Tales' at Ballet

WWD Kristen Tauer
WWD January 15, 2019

ESTÉE LAUDER
Free Gift
Your Choice
Over a $170 Value!

With any Estée Lauder purchase of $37.50 or more.*
AMEA Living x Estée Lauder Exclusive Bag

* Offer good while supplies last. Quantities limited. One gift per customer, please.

Available at NORDSTROM Shop Now >

What to Read Next

Like many popular classical ballets, Ballet Austin's newest production is plucked from the world of fairy tales.

But fairy tales aren't synonymous with idealism, and "Grimm Tales," a full-length ballet making its debut March 29, explores the dark and often horrific side of Jacob Grimm and Wilhelm Grimm's 19th-century stories.

Related stories

American Ballet Theatre Unveils Women's Movement at Fall Gala

The Making of a Kanye West Ballet

EXCLUSIVE: Fashion Takes a Twirl at New York City Ballet

Ballet Austin artistic director and choreographer Stephen Mills was inspired by an exhibition of New York-based artist Natalie Frank's work and accompanying book, aptly titled "Grimm Tales." Frank's colorful drawings underscore the provocative nature and feminist voice of the Grimms' stories, an element that has also been adapted into the world of ballet.

"What I think a lot of people don't know is that the Grimms' tales began as women's oral tales, so they're a way for women to represent their fears and anxieties and desires at a time where they were quieted by the church or the state. So they are a little bit transgressive," says Frank of her source material. "Stephen's

College student dies after falling from 'treacherous' cliff during group photo with friends

Yahoo Lifestyle

This Quiz Will Guess Your 1st Car

Autoversed.com Sponsored

Search

Search

Frank's work will be incorporated into the production through onstage projections and animations, and she has teamed with Tony-nominated costume designer Constance Hoffman. While Hoffman is charged with the ballet's costumes, the pair are collaborating on the textile design, and the entire process has taken a collaborative shape with each element — including set design by George Tsybin and music by Graham Reynolds — impacting the various parts.

During a visit to Frank's artist studio off the Jefferson L subway stop in Brooklyn, it's quickly apparent that the women have fostered an easy camaraderie and friendship over the course of working together. Neither artist had previously embarked on a collaboration of this scope, rooted in conversation. And although daunting for both in the beginning, the experience of discomfort has paid creative dividends.

The costume designer was initially hesitant when Frank invited her to work on the project. Hoffman admired Frank's book of artwork, but wanted to make sure that her involvement would benefit the project.

"It took me awhile to get comfortable with feeling that I wasn't somehow intruding, to find my feet," says Hoffman, adding that the pair began by discussing paintings and drawings that Frank had already created for the project. Her first inclination was to suggest that Frank design the costumes herself. "They were such a complete vision that I asked the question again, I said, 'Don't freak out, I'm not abandoning you, but do you really want me to do this?'" she adds. The answer, of course, was yes. "I tried to ask a lot of hard questions of myself as well as of Natalie in terms of the decision to work together, and I just wanted to make sure that we each had our voices but that it wasn't unnecessary."

The pair traveled to Austin, Tex. — Frank's hometown — to watch the company's dancers rehearse, and the experience helped inform Hoffman's approach to the costumes. Through observing their quality of movement, she saw the importance of simplifying the costume design, and Frank came to a similar conclusion for her approach to the backdrops.

"My drawings are generally about aggregation," says Frank, surrounded by her colorful works for various projects mounted on the walls. "It's been a completely new way of thinking in terms of simplifying the visual imagery, because it's no longer just the drawing: it's the drawing, the dancer, the costume, the choreography, the music, the lighting....I made this first set, and every single detail was so fussed over and everything was signifying something, and I realized when we went down for rehearsals there was no way that was going to be translated onstage."

Hoffman notes the difficulty of having an audience extrapolate meaning from a still image when in context of a stage production. For her, the process involved letting go of specific details in the costumes

"You put clothes on a person and you try to put that symbolism into them, an audience can't actually follow it, so it's just going to become

Melania Trump's spokeswoman slams cover of first lady's wind-blown hair during visit to military base

Yahoo Lifestyle

Police try to shut down a man giving home: people haircuts in viral video

Yahoo Lifestyle

Can We Guess Where You Grew Up from You Snacks?

HowStuffWorks Sponsored

What's Going on with Kim Kardashian's Basi Less Sinks?

InStyle

Here's How Much Ariana Grande Got Paid For Her Coachella Set

Seventeen

